A Journal-Miner man was shown one of the most unique scheme for advertising that has been presented to the people of this section for many a frame about three by four feet, covered with glass, inside of which is arranged photographs of ten of the principal business houses of the city, and in the center of these pictures is on general view of the city.

When one first looks at the fram

he sees only a splendid view of the outside of the business houses represented, but by pressing a button at the bottom of the frame the scene is changed, for the outside picture swings open in the middle like a double door and behold you have a grand view of the interior of the room or building. The effect is most pleasing. Another pleasing effect is that there is no reading matter either written or printed on the photographs, the usual signs of the firms giving the necessary information as to whose place of business it is. This takes off the usual resemblance of an advertisement and causes the one looking at he scene to more closely observe the

> Phillip Frye, Jr., says that he and his brothers went to hed about nine o'clock, leaving their father in the saloon, which adjoined their bedroom. They had been asleep some time, he said, when he heard some one call from the outside and ask his father to open the door and give him a drink of whisky

Mr. Frye opened the door and permitted the stranger to enter. Almost immediately, the boy says, he heard a scuffle. Both boys jumped out of bed and ran to see what was the matter. They found their father leaning against the bar, with a torrent of blood streaming from a cut in his neck. He was trying to stop the flow with both hands. He died before medical aid reached him.
